NATIONAL NEWS:

If you were on the road this holiday weekend, you probably noticed they were a little more calm than you might have expected. Experts say a combination of the bad weather and high gas prices resulted in the point-one percent decline in motorists this Memorial Day weekend.

You probably know that you shouldn't drive if you're tired, And now a new study shows just how dangerous that can be. Being deprived of sleep even for only one night can cause your brain to have a shutdown similar to a power failure, the study revealed. People who are sleep deprived go through periods of time when the brain is in a state between sleep and wakefulness. This results in lapses in visual attention, which could have fatal consequences on the road.
